We have a RabbitMQ server that we use to send a message to multiple clients, which are all configured to execute a specific task on the message. Is there a way to be able to run multiple consumers in parallel on the same message? What are the best practices to deal with this problem? A: RabbitMQ has an option called auto-declare which will let you call the declare method on an exchange to have messages automatically routed to all queues which match a pattern. If you wanted to have this set up so that all messages with a common header value would automatically go to a specific queue, your declaration pattern might look something like this: declare-exchanges='' declare-queues='' declare-bindings='' You can then use the declared exchanges and queues as normal, and if you add a binding for each consumer, the messages will get routed to those consumers. You can do the same with queues, and then create a consumer on each. See the RabbitMQ site for more info. A: what you need is called "push technology", since all nodes are potentially interested in the same topic (the one you're publishing on), and when the publisher publishes, all interested peers should pull, i.e. consume, the message. you can configure your consumers in rabbitmq to consume when the next message is available in the queue. This can be done by declaring and binding queues, with auto-declaration and auto-bind directives. Auto-declare will trigger the declaration of queues/exchanges when the consumer declares a queue/exchange that matches the given pattern. You will then need to tell your consumers where to consume from, so they can pull any message when it is available { "name": "portal", "x-ha-policy": "none", "x-ha-conditions": "all", "declare-type": "queue", "x-ha-group-infos": [{ "name": "default" }], "declare-bindings": [{
